Teaching Philosophy

In my opinion, the “learning process” implies the interchange of teaching experiences and the theoretical background that students can acquire from literacy. Students must absorb as much knowledge as possible from libraries but it has to be directed and boost with our professional experience in order to reach the highest percentage of applicability in real life. Theory without experimentation is not enough in our fast evolving world; therefore I pursue deep exposition to real business world environment in my classes and activities, so students become “decision makers”.

Teaching Specialties

- Logistics
- Operations Management
- Supply Chain Management
- Production Management

Professional Profile

After more than 13 years of professional managerial experience in different industries: banking, retailing, industrial, mass consumption, and education; I realized that all this knowledge has to be shared as retribution to what I have learned.

The more I learn, the more knowledge I must share; this keeps me updated and in constant search of excellence.
